Horseguards Hotel

Whitehall Court, built in 1884 in the style of a French château, is now a Grade I listed building of architectural interest. The exterior is original, although the interior has been considerably changed. When built, the block was divided into full serviced apartments of three or more bedrooms each. The ground floor housed numerous amenities, including a restaurant and a smoking room. Whitehall Court's history is dotted with names of famous residents such as William Gladstone, Lord Kitchener, Grand Duke Michael of Russia, George Bernard Shaw, and many more.

During World War I, the eighth floor quarters in block two (now the hotel) were used by the Secret Service. During World War II, most of the building was taken over by Government departments; the fifth floor utilized by Russian Embassy, the sixth floor by the American Embassy, and the seventh floor by the Air Training Corps. In 2005, PAYE Stonework's specialist masons and restorers were appointed to clean and repair the facades to their former glory.
